Is your married life conducted on a basis of co-partnership?

And if not, who not?

The wisest move a newly-married man ever made at the beginning of his dozen friends of the hostesses were matrimonial career was to accept his wife as his life partner, not only in the frivolities of his life, but in the more sensible and substantial business sense. It is remarkable enough to be quoted that in a large number of well-regulated families the woman's head is relied upon to systematize and regulate expenses, with a result generally of striking business sagacity.

You will hear another class of men rail at the extravagance of but you rarely hear the reasons for that reckless waste,

In nine cases out of ten, men are the real promoters of their wives' extravagance. They revel in their wives display, inasmuch as it reflects on them the credit of success, and however irate a man may seem at the exorbitant cost of a new French gown, his annoyance is generally appeared by the compliments he receives in the homage paid to his wife's good taste and his Judge and Mrs. Henry E. Cooper at

Some women are often induced by their husbands to expend lavishly on entertaining for purely business motives, and in these cases expense is never

Often women are extravagant through ignorance, when, having been de-nied even a glimpse into their husbands' bank account, they succeed in spending more than they can afford.

A business conducted on such flimsy principles would soon meet with disaster, and it hardly merits wonder that many domestic partnerships are returning by moonlight. similarly dissolved.

To those men who habitually scoff at the business ability of women be it said that the first savings bank in history was founded by a woman.

And since that time women have always been more frequent depositors. From the time that money came into circulation women of all classes have Lieutenant and Mrs. Roy Francis kept their own savings banks, from Delft teapots to holes in mattresses, and these contingencies have in innumerable cases met crises in a dignified way.

these contingencies have in innumerable cases met crises in a dignified way and saved the family from degradation. Women are in the minority who lack the instinct of saving. For money means much more to the weaker sex than it does to men, and is the only means of saving them from ignoble disgrace in times of great stress and need. A man regards his savings indifferently.

With spare change in his pockets he can drift from one sphere of life to Yaughn, Lieutenant Price and Lieu-another, and in the event of his failing at one line of work it is easy for him tenant Leo Sahm. to take up another line.

He can always eat, in emergency, at a free lunch counter; there is always a park bench for his midnight resting place,

No such compensations, however, await the woman who fails, either through her husband's indiscretions or her own, and in consequence her necessity to save some, if not all, of her own or her husband's earnings is urgent. The greatest triumph in history of this foresight was the debt of the Franco-Prussian war, which was settled by the gleanings of thousands of frugal French stockings which had been laid away for a rainy day.
